With the Bank Holiday at the start of the week, this week has absolutely flown by! But the children have worked just as hard to fit everything in!

During maths this week, the children were looking at duration of time again and seeing if they could figure out start and end times of events when given the duration. They all did well, and some children even linked this to their timetable work we did when we looked at statistics earlier this term!

In English this week, the children have managed to plan, write, and edit their balanced argument about the Roman Invasion of Britain. It was tricky to think of positives to begin with, but by the end of the discussions and planning, the children had strong for arguments, despite most of them being against the invasion!

Turns out that I had been teaching the wrong French in week one this term! But the children have caught up and are now able to say where they live and what they have inside their home. Their pronunciation is getting much better – I am trying to keep up!

Our history this week links nicely to our English as we looked at the Roman Army in more detail. The children then had to create a job advert for people to join the Roman army. They made it gruesome, yet persuasive!

Unfortunately, my iPad has been out of action this week – pictures to come next week!
